There were two men who lived by the rail The lightning train went by their house every night. It came rattling along the valley towards their house; they could see it coming from a great distance. It whirled by their house in a cloud of dust and in an instant it thundered on, past the station which was just beyond their house, and along the bank of the river, until it was out of sight, and then, in a moment more. out of hearing. I said it ran along the bank of the river. The bank was at this place very steep and rocky. The track of the railroad ran along close to the brink where it was twenty feet down to the water; and up, on the other side of the track, the rocky bank rose steeply for thirty or forty feet. It was a dangerous looking place to dash thro' in the lightning express.

These two men that I told you of were very good sort of men their neighbors thought but in the corner of the heart, hid away in a very little space, as I said, there was a very great wickedness. They had a quarrel with the engineer of the lightning express, and they resolved they would revenge themselves upon him. They went out one rainy night, a little while before it was time for the train to come by, and they climbed up the steep bank that overhung the track. They carried two crowbars. When they reached the top of the rock they first looked all around to see that they were not observed, and then they began prying over a huge boulder that stood on the hill-side. A boulder is a great stone, usually rounding in its shape. They pried it up till it began to roll. It started slowly but rolled faster and faster till it came down with a tremendous crash right upo: the track. Then these two wicked men took | 1 Goods and groceries, can be had at up their bars and went home. They had not been long in the house before they heard the rattling of the lightning train away up the valley. They looked at each other, but they

All this time the engineer was riding or that locomotive would be a terrifying thing. But that engineer had grown used to it, and he enjoyed it. He seemed never so happy as when he was dashing along the country at forty miles an hour, with just as much as he could do all the time to keep a good look out and manage his engine. So he came roaring down the valley this dark rainy night, going forward every now and then to look out ahead. The wind and rain almost blinden him, but he always kept a sharp lookout ahead, rain or no rain. On the front of the engine he had an enormous lantern fixed, with a reflector as large round as a barrel.-It was set so as to throw all the light torward on the track at a great distance. He watched everything by this light. Suddenly, as they were whirling towards the steep bank, he thought he caught a glimpse of a dark object at a great distance on the track. He did not know what it was, whether it was a cow, or a man, or only a shadow, but he was afraid. Instantly he stopped the engine and reversed its motion as soon as he could: he blew the whistle long and loud; the brake men sprang to the brakes to check the train, and the passengers in the cars started up wondering what was the matter. The train was very heavy and went grinding on and on, but it went slower and slower. The engineer was watching intently all the time to see what it was upon the track, and before they reached it he saw by the aid of the great reflector-lantern, that it was a huge round

The passengers got out as the train stop- and various other styles of ped, just before the rock, to see what was the trouble. "I thank God," said the engineer, also Ladies' and Gents' "that I saw the rock in time." He was stand- | 'hains, ing in the rain out on the front of his engine as he said it, but he took off his hat revereut ly, for he was grateful to his heavenly Father for such an escape. "If I had been thirty Hooks, seconds later," he said, "it would have been | Every description of the end of us."

They did not know how the rock came LADLES, there. Some of them thought the rain had NAPKIN loosened the soil on the bank and let it roll down. The engineer did not say much, but he silently resolved in future to keep a sharper lookout than ever.

The wicked men who did this now felt more wicked still. They watched the train Fishing Tackle, Sc., Eye Glasses and Spectacles FRED E. "I'll tell you what was the mistake," said one of them to BOOKS AND STATIONERY the other; "the stone was too big. We Miscellaneous Works of the best authors, nice" must do something small that the engineer can't see."

So the next night they went down to the station, where there was a turn-out, or siding. in the track, and a switch.

Who knows what a switch is? A place to turn off. Yes. It is a place in Paper and Sheet Music of all kinds. the track where one rail on each side is movable, so that by turning it, you can lead the can be bought in the state. train off upon a side track, or siding as they call it. It is a very little thing to move a thing is done. These men thought that if they moved the switch, the train, instead of

It was an awful scene that night-men, women and children drowned, crushed, scalded, maimed, and the whole train wrecked and ruined; because those wicked men had moved the switch just one little inch.

Now, children, whenever you are tempted to do wrong, remember that it is not the greatness or the littleness of the thing you to that makes the sin great or little. I knew a boy who, when his father asked him if he had learned his lessons, didn't dare to say. "Yes, father, I have." That he thought would be telling a lie, because he had not learned H them. But he did nod his head. "That is " not telling a lie," he said to himself, "it is only nodding." Now when you are tempted to equivocate or act an untruth, remember that s just as bad as telling a lie. You can't tell a little lie. There is no little way to tell a a lie. It is just as bad to move the switch an inch in the track of truth as it is to put a big falsehood right in the way. It is just as wicked, and often it is far more injurious. Never do wrong upon the excuse that it is a only a little wrong. Sins that you think only little sins are always wicked, and someimes produce the most terrible results.- = Sanday School Times.
